Thousands marched through London, with some of the protesters refusing to allow police to keep them moving. The protest was held on the fourth anniversary of the collapse of the government of Tony Blair and Gordon Brown. The idea of a new runway at Heathrow has been dismissed as "extreme", but Transport Secretary Justine Greening says she will "carefully" consider a new runway. In her latest speech Ms Greening said an expansion of Heathrow was justified by a growing population and the need for more air capacity in the south-east. On Saturday, Mr Blair led a rally of his supporters in central London, which would have taken place just yards away from protesters on their own march, his spokesman has said. "It's the same old line but it's a change in the time of day," said Mr Blair. "The protest on Saturday will take place on the anniversary of Tony Blair and Gordon Brown's resignation and it's a fantastic tribute to them and to the idea of political opposition," he added.
